The martial arts

Many of the martial arts we know today, like judo and karate, began in the Far East a long time ago. Nearly 1000 years ago, Japan had a strong army and its soldiers were called Samurai. These ancient Japanese warriors used to fight with bows and swords, but they also developed martial arts so that they could continue fighting if they lost their sword.

Kendo (the way of the sword)

This martial art was practised by the Samurai from about 1200. It is a form of sword-fighting, using a special bamboo stick called a shinai. The competitors, or kendoka, wear special armour to protect themselves. Each fight lasts three to five minutes.

Sumo wrestling

Sumo is a very old form of fighting that began over 2000 years ago. The fights were held in front of the Emperor and they were an important part of the Shinto religion. Sumo wrestling is still very popular in Japan. Sumo wrestlers fight in a small ring and have to try and push their opponent out.

The wrestlers are famous because of their enormous size - many of them weigh 200 kg, and the heaviest Sumo wrestler was 225 kg. They put on weight by eating a special diet, but they are very fit as well.

Judo (the way gentleness)

Judo is a form of fighting that was developed by dr Kano from the ancient art of jujitsu. In judo, the fighter tries to make use of his or her opponent's weight and strength to throw him or her to the ground. Judo fighters need to be fast and have to think quickly, but they don't need to be strong.

Judo became an Olympic sport in 1964, and points in the sport are awarded for technique, not strength. Everyone wears a white jacket and trousers, but the colour of the belt indicates the level of the fighter. Students wear different coloured belts - first yellow, then orange, green and finally brown. The teachers wear black or red belts.
